Should we assume only positive input for b? If the initial input for b is negative an infinite loop occurs and every call is iterative, making it an overall iterative function. If we assume any input for b and we luckly get a positive integer, it would be an overall recursive function. Am I understanding this concept correctly?

Consider all functions valid for only non-negative numbers, unless otherwise specified.

Thank you!